This volume in the Time-Life Civil War series looks at the events following the Second Battle of Bull Run, during which Lee squared off against McClellan again as the Confederates mounted their 1862 invasion of Maryland. This battle would be particularly bloody and would result in the greatest loss of life in a single ever suffered by American soldiers. Bloody sites such as the Cornfield, Dunker Church and Bloody Lane would enter American history as some of the darkest points of our story. The battle would serve to highlight the inability of the Confederacy to mount an effective campaign on northern soil but it would also bring to light the continuing problem of Yankee leadership of its armies. Another great book in the series, well-written and illustrated with period photos, maps, artwork and photos of artifacts. Sidebars include an artist's view of the battle, photos of Harper's Ferry, The Making of a Union Heroine and Gallery of the Dead.

Good depiction of the time line of the battle. The whole series is a good addition to the military library.

I'm interested to either read about civil war battles, or visit the sites where it happened. This book was a very good version of how so many men lost their lives when the South went to invade the North. I recommend this book to any civil war history buff.

I did not know Time Life had a series of Civil War books! I own a few of them now and I truly enjoy reading about the different events and people during those turbulent times!
